INTRODUCTION

I. APPROACH AND RATIONALE

The National Center for History in the Schools (NCHS) has developed the following collection of lessons for teaching with primary sources. This adds to more than sixty teaching units that are the fruit of a collaboration between history professors and experienced teachers of United States and World history. They represent specific episodes in history from which you and your students can pause to delve into the deeper meanings of these selected landmark events and explore their wider context in the great historical narrative.

By studying a crucial episode in history the student becomes aware that choices had to be made by real human beings, that those decisions were the result of specific factors, and that they set in motion a series of historical consequences. We have selected dramatic moments that bring alive that decision-making process. We hope that through this approach, your students will realize that history is an ongoing, open-ended process, and that the decisions they make today create the conditions of tomorrow’s history.

NCHS teaching units are based on primary sources, taken from documents, artifacts, journals, diaries, newspapers and literature from the period under study. What we hope to achieve using primary source documents in these lessons is to remove the distance that students feel from historical events and to connect them more intimately with the past. In this way we hope to recreate for your students a sense of “being there,” a feeling of seeing history through the eyes of the very people who were making decisions. This will help your students develop historical empathy, to realize that history is not an impersonal process divorced from real people like themselves. At the same time, by analyzing primary sources, students will actually practice the historian’s craft, discovering for themselves how to analyze evidence, establish a valid interpretation and construct a coherent narrative in which all the relevant factors play a part.

II. CONTENT AND ORGANIZATION

Within this unit, you will find: 1) Unit Objectives, 2) Correlation to the National History Standards, 3) Teacher Background Materials, 4) Lesson Plans, and 5) Student Resources. This unit, as we have said above, focuses on certain key moments in time and should be used as a supplement to your customary course materials. Although these lessons are recommended for grades 8-12, the readings will need to be adapted for effective use by eighth grade students.

The teacher background section should provide you with a good overview of the entire unit and with the historical information and context necessary to link the specific
Introduction

“dramatic moment” to the larger historical narrative. You may consult it for your own use, and you may choose to share it with students if they are of a sufficient grade level to understand the materials.

The lesson plans include a variety of ideas and approaches for the teacher which can be elaborated upon or cut as you see the need. These lesson plans contain student resources which accompany each lesson. The resources consist of primary source documents, any handouts or student background materials, and a bibliography.

In our series of teaching units, each collection can be taught in several ways. You can teach all of the lessons offered on any given topic, or you can select and adapt the ones that best support your particular course needs. We have not attempted to be comprehensive or prescriptive in our offerings, but rather to give you an array of enticing possibilities for in-depth study, at varying grade levels. We hope that you will find the lesson plans exciting and stimulating for your classes. We also hope that your students will never again see history as a boring sweep of inevitable facts and meaningless dates but rather as an endless treasure of real life stories, and an exercise in analysis and reconstruction.
TEACHER BACKGROUND MATERIALS

I. UNIT OVERVIEW

Using primary sources, this unit explores the founding of the twelfth and most successful of the English colonies in North America, Pennsylvania. Established by the Quaker civil libertarian William Penn, Pennsylvania was intended to demonstrate that a society founded on mutual respect, tolerance, and individual responsibility could flourish. The first fifty years of this province demonstrate that European-Indian relations need not have been based on violence and the destruction of native cultures. Not only were Europeans able to dispense with fortifications for their settlements and live in peace with Indians, but the Indian population actually grew, and natives from other areas migrated to the province seeking refuge from the aggressiveness of white settlers. In a crucial departure from the past, religious tolerance was also legally guaranteed. Previously, there was a common belief that a government could not sanction more than one religion because people would quarrel if they did not agree about sacred things. However, Penn understood that separate religious groups might share common interests. The government of Pennsylvania explicitly derived its authority from the people it was intended to govern. Although Penn wrote the laws that articulated these values, the people who settled in Pennsylvania endorsed them and made them work, creating a stable, pluralistic, and tolerant society.

Students should understand that many of the values and beliefs that are fundamental to the United States originated in colonial Pennsylvania. The separation of church and state, the conviction that religious and cultural pluralism could be healthy rather than harmful, and faith in people’s capacity to govern themselves were social innovations first tested in Pennsylvania. Students should also learn of the peaceful relations between Indian natives and European settlers which marked the first decades of this colony. A central tenet of American life is that tolerance is essential to a well-ordered society of happy individuals. The implications of this belief were first worked out by the heterogeneous settlers of Pennsylvania. This unit allows students to appreciate the achievement of these early Americans and reflect on the importance of tolerance.

II. UNIT CONTEXT

This unit can conclude a study of the early colonization efforts of the English. Contrasting the colonization of Pennsylvania with Jamestown and the Massachusetts Bay Colony would be an excellent way to introduce students to some of the persistent regional differences that mark American history. This unit also prepares students to study the mature colonial America of the eighteenth century. Moreover, the values and government of Pennsylvania anticipate some of the ideological concerns that led to the Revolutionary War. Inasmuch as the population of the United States is increasingly enriched by ethnic and cultural groups from regions which have not traditionally supplied us with large numbers of immigrants, an appreciation of tolerance is as important today as it was in 1681.

III. Correlation to National Standards for United States History

The unit requires students to engage in historical thinking and to go beyond the facts presented in textbooks to examine the historical record for themselves. Lessons provide primary source materials that challenge students to consider multiple perspectives, to compare different sets of ideals and values, and to draw evidence from visual sources. The documents help students to better appreciate historical perspectives by describing the past on its own terms through the eyes and experiences of those who were there.
IV. UNIT OBJECTIVES

1. To study historical documents in order to experience history as a dynamic discipline which studies, interprets, and debates the meaning of human artifacts and, through those, humanity's collective past.

2. To examine the effect that the Quakers' respect for life and abhorrence of violence had on establishing relations with Indians based on trust and honesty.

3. To study two of the founding principles of Pennsylvania, namely religious toleration, and faith in the people's capacity to govern, and to consider the extent to which those values remain valid in today's world.

4. To speculate on how treating women as the spiritual equals of men, rather than their inferiors, affected women and altered Quaker society.

5. To appreciate the ethnic diversity of Pennsylvania and to experiment with the methods historians use to investigate people from the past.

V. INTRODUCTION TO WILLIAM PENN'S PEACEABLE KINGDOM

In 1681, when William Penn was granted a royal charter by Charles II to establish colony on a vast tract of land west of the Delaware River, the most distinct and, by some standards, the most successful of all the colonial experiments undertaken in North America began. Pennsylvania was established on the last segment of the eastern coast of North America to be assigned to English colonists except Georgia. Giving title to Penn as repayment for a debt originally owed to Penn's father, Charles II may also have hoped that this gift would help to rid England of Quakers, a growing and troublesome Protestant sect.

Like the Puritans, the Religious Society of Friends, derisively called Quakers, regarded the Church of England as corrupt and in need of reform. Led by George Fox and Margaret Fell, the Friends held that everyone could receive grace and achieve redemption through the “inner light” residing in each person. Their belief in the free individual quest for truth and in truth's essential persuasiveness led them to reject most of the trappings of organized religion. They believed that no church official, institution, or ritual was needed to mediate between individuals and God. Also, like the Puritans, as their movement gathered followers they were severely persecuted.

The Quaker's egalitarian doctrine of inner light had radical social implications for the rigidly hierarchical society of seventeenth-century England. The organized state church felt threatened by the Quakers' insistence that there was no need for a trained professional clergy to instruct those who would be saved. Civil society may have been even more thoroughly alarmed by the social manifestations of an ideology that stressed the potential that resides within each person, regardless of his or her social station. The Quaker insistence on using the plain and familiar language of “thee” and “thou” rather than the formal and deferential “you,” their use of full names instead of titles when addressing persons of rank, and most conspicuously their refusal to tip their hats to social superiors, stemmed from their conviction that all people are capable of responding to an inner light. (Students usually think that “thee” and “thou” are more formal than “you” so you will probably have to clarify this for them.)

Their belief in the essential sanctity and worth of human life led them to renounce all violence, including military service. It also meant that they accepted the spiritual equality of women. Women were encouraged to preach and participate in church affairs. Until the end of the eighteenth century, the regular women’s meetings of the Quakers were the only formal organizations run by white women in North America. It is not surprising that the strength, skills, and self-confidence women developed in these meetings empowered Quaker women to take leading roles in the women’s rights and abolitionist movements of the nineteenth century.

From a twentieth-century perspective Quaker pacifism seems the most singular feature of Quaker social practice. But the seventeenth century was much more threatened and alarmed by the Quaker’s levelling tendencies, reflected in the prominent roles achieved by Quaker women and their persistent refusal to practice any of the conventional forms of deference, from doffing hats to bowing and curtsying. In the early years of the Society of Friends, Quakers were tortured, imprisoned, and executed. Even prominent figures were regularly imprisoned. Margaret Fell, for instance, wrote Women’s Speaking Justified while under arrest. By 1689, when the Toleration Act of William and Mary was declared, there had been over 450 Quaker martyrs. Despite the repressive times, the Quaker movement grew rapidly, attracting most of its membership from the middle ranks of English society.

William Penn was an unusual convert to Quakerism. Most Quaker men were artisans, small merchants, or independent farmers, who, by seventeenth-century standards, were economically comfortable. While they were often people of some education, most had not been to college. Penn was decidedly not of this class; he was Oxford-educated and part of England’s ruling elite. His father was an admiral and a friend of the king. Upon Penn’s conversion, his social position and natural talents quickly enabled him to join the inner circle of the Society of Friends. Within a year of his conversion in 1667, he was a prominent Quaker pamphleteer and lobbyist. During the mid-1670s he traveled to North Almost from their founding, Quakers had been interested in the New World. Their commitment to proselytizing drew them there to convert both natives and European colonizers. Like the Puritans, they too sought a place free from persecution where they could pursue their dream of creating a utopian community which would serve as a model for the rest of society. But the society they sought to create bore little resemblance to the strict social and religious conformity and rigid hierarchy insisted upon by the Puritans. Quakers were committed to religious tolerance and the extension of civil liberties. When Penn was in West Jersey he helped write a remarkably modern sounding constitution which promised religious freedom, trial by jury, and a legislative assembly that was annually elected by virtually all free males. Although this community foundered in its first years amid tangled legal claims to the land, Quaker hopes were later focused on the west side of the Delaware River which Charles II granted to Penn to 1681.

If the Chesapeake can be characterized as attracting aggressive men on the make who were intent on exploiting the region’s resources through bound labor, and the Massachusetts Bay Colony was marked by religious conformity and social homogeneity, which tended to suppress or expel those who diverged from a narrow norm, Pennsylvania from the beginning stressed religious tolerance, cultural pluralism, and peace between natives and immigrants. While Penn was interested in turning a profit on his real estate, he was even more concerned that this colony serve as a sanctuary for those who suffered religious persecution or the effects of hostile state power. Unlike most governments of the time, his state put faith in people’s capacity to govern themselves and claimed no authority to shape the consciences of its citizens.

Penn set the initial tone of tolerance and mutual respect by contacting those already settled in the region he was to control. He assured both the Delawares and Europeans that they could continue to live in their accustomed fashion. More significantly, he acknowledged the natives as the rightful owners of the land and promised European colonists would purchase land from them on agreeable terms. By the time Quaker settlers began pouring into the region, the native Delawares and Susquehannocks had already had considerable contact with Europeans. The region had previously been part of the Dutch New Netherlands and continued to be sparsely settled by Dutch, Finnish, and Swedish settlers even after the English took control of the region in 1664. But the skepticism with which the Indians may (understandably) have greeted Penn’s first letter to them was soon replaced by trust.

For over half a century the peoples of Pennsylvania proved they could live together harmoniously. But the experiment in understanding was only partially successful. Ironically, the colony’s prosperity and tolerance drew numerous displaced natives who sought sanctuary from aggressive white settlers. However, during the same years the colony attracted large numbers of Germans and Scots-Irish who did not share Quaker beliefs and who came in their own quest for land. By the mid-eighteenth century friction between these groups was as abrasive as in other colonies.

4. A Mixed Multitude
London, 18 October 1681

My Friends,

There is one great God and power that has made the world and all things therein, to whom you and I and all people owe their being and well-being, and to whom you and I must one day give an account for all that we do in this world. This great God has written his law in our hearts, by which we are taught and commanded to love and help and do good to one another, and not to do harm and mischief one unto another. Now this great God has been pleased to make me concerned in your parts of the world, and the king of the country where I live has given unto me a great province therein, but I desire to enjoy it with your friends, else what would the great God say to us, who has made us not to devour and destroy one another, but live soberly and kindly together in the world.

Now I would have you well observe, that I am very sensible of the unkindness and injustice that has been too much exercised towards you by the people of these parts of the world, who have sought themselves, and to make great advantages by you, rather than be examples of justice and goodness unto you; which I hear has been matter of trouble to you and caused great grudgings and animosities, sometimes to the shedding of blood, which has made the great God angry. But I am not such man as is well known in my own country. I have great love and regard toward you, and I desire to win and gain your love and friendship by a kind just, and peaceable life; and the people I send are of the same mind, and shall in all things behave themselves accordingly. And if in anything any shall offend you or your people, you shall have a full and speedy satisfaction for the same by an equal number of honest men on both sides, that by no means you may have just occasion of being offended against them.

I shall shortly come to you myself, at what time we may more largely and freely confer and discourse of these matters. In the meantime, I have sent my commissioners to treat with you about land a firm league of peace. Let me desire you to be kind to them and the people, and receive these presents and tokens which I have sent to you as a testimony of my good will to you and my resolution to live justly, peaceably, and friendly with you. I am your friend.

Lesson One
The Holy Experiment

A. Objectives

♦ To examine documents that show Quaker-Indian relations to be founded on nonviolence, trust, and fairness.

♦ To show through this example of Indian-European harmony that conflict with native Americans and the erosion of their culture was not an inevitable consequence of European contact.

♦ To speculate about the values that students believe necessary for the society they want to create.

B. Lesson Activities

1. Ask students what they know about the relations between Indians and Europeans. Students probably know that relations were marked by hate and violence. They may also know that the Indian populations were decimated by contagious diseases carried by Europeans.

   a. Have students consider why relations between these two groups were so troubled. They might attribute the hatred between them to ethnocentrism, greed for land, fear of the unfamiliar, or a mixture of these factors.

   b. Explain that while these are common emotions which help to explain such hostility, this hostility was not inevitable. They are about to study a colony where different values helped to create a very different set of relations.

2. Pass out copies of the Dramatic Moment, William Penn’s first letter to the Delaware (also called Lenni Lenape), and have students read along as you read it to them.

   a. Have them discuss their impressions. They should also have questions about the text. Answer informational ones, like the meaning of vocabulary or who William Penn is and how he got this land. But turn the more speculative questions back to the class for their thoughts. Among the issues they should discuss is whether this letter bears out their impressions about Indian-white relations. Obviously, the question is more complex than they may at first appreciate. First, Penn acknowledges the sort of Indian-settler relations with which most students are familiar. He also promises that the relations he expects to establish with the Delaware will be different from the sort Indians have come to expect. But since Europeans' initial contact with Indians was usually marked by lofty promises of peace and friendship, is there any reason for historians to regard this document as an accurate guide to the future relations between Quakers and the Delaware?

b. Try to get students to distinguish between the way a historian might interpret this document and the way the Delaware might have interpreted it. As fledgling historians, they should begin to grapple with the most difficult task of the historian's craft: interpretation. They must bring all their knowledge, understanding, and experience to bear to put this document in a plausible context. Part of such an understanding should include an imaginative and empathetic guess about how the Delaware would have reacted to this letter.

c. Have students hypothesize about the sort of evidence they would need to determine whether Penn fulfilled his pledge of peace to the Delaware. Such evidence might include records reflecting trade and mutual respect between the races, showing that Quaker settlers were establishing communities without militias and fortifications, or indicating that Indian and white populations grew without significant conflicts. Historians have found an abundance of all of this evidence. Tell them that they are about to read three such samples of evidence.

3. Have students read Document A, an excerpt from a letter to the Free Society of Traders, a deed for land, and an excerpt from Penn’s land policy.

a. After dividing the class into small groups, have students discuss the excerpts’ meaning. Discussion should be focused on evaluating what kinds of things can be learned from each. For instance, some students might find Penn’s willingness to learn the language of the Delaware a sign of his respect—most Europeans expected Indians to learn their language. His praise for the beauty of the language also suggests admiration.

b. Other students may be impressed by the deed as evidence that Penn not only kept his word to buy land from the original Indian owners before selling it to settlers, but continued to insist that settlers respect the neighboring Indians. They may also feel that a legal document is more persuasive than an advertisement.
c. Similarly, some students might be persuaded that Penn was earnest in his desire to treat the Indians fairly after reading the codification of Indian rights in Penn’s land policy.

C. CONCLUDING ACTIVITIES

1. Show the class the prints of paintings by Edward Hicks (1780–1849) entitled “Peaceable Kingdom” (Illustrations 1A and 1B). Hicks painted approximately sixty versions of the painting; many versions show Penn and the Delaware making a peace treaty in the background, while the foreground shows lambs and lions, wolves and cows resting in peace. Hicks also painted a larger version of the peace treaty in the background of “Peaceable Kingdom” (Illustration 2). The arrangement of the human figures was taken from the painting of Benjamin West (1738–1820) “William Penn's Treaty With the Indians.” West’s painting was also the model for the frieze of the treaty in the United States capitol (Illustration 3).

2. After discussing the allegorical implications of Hicks’ “Peaceable Kingdom,” have the students attempt their own interpretive drawing of the relation between the Indians and whites of Pennsylvania. Of course, the pictures can be abstract. If time permits and interest warrants, ask students to interpret one another’s work.

3. Have students look carefully at Benjamin West’s “William Penn’s Treaty with the Indians” (Illustration 3). Discuss what we can learn about history from the study of paintings or prints of historic events. How can we tell if a painting is a realistic view of what took place? How can we tell if an artist’s painting reflects an accurate account of a historical event? Tell students that Benjamin West did not record history; he created it! His idealized painting, “William Penn’s Treaty with the Indians,” is the earliest reference to the alleged meeting at Shackamaxon. If fictitious, the image has become a symbol of the Quaker influence in American history. Because he relied on descriptions of Penn as an old man, West made him look older than 38, Penn’s age in 1682. He depicted Indian and Quaker clothing of the late 1700s and his view of Shackamaxon did not exist in reality when the meeting reportedly took place.

4. Reexamine Edward Hicks “Peaceable Kingdom.” How did Hicks elaborate on Benjamin West’s painting? What is the message of Hicks’ painting?
Excerpt from "A Letter From William Penn . . . To The Committee of the Free Society of Traders," (Philadelphia, August 16, 1683). Used as an advertisement for Pennsylvania, this letter was printed and sold in London.

My Kind Friends;

... [The Delaware's] language is lofty, yet narrow like the Hebrew; in signification full, like shorthand in writing; one word serves in the place of three, and the rest are supplied by the understanding of the hearer; . . . I have made it my business to understand it, that I might not want an interpreter on any occasion; and I must say that I know not a language spoken in Europe that has words of more sweetness or greatness, in accent and emphasis, than theirs; for instance, Octoraro, Rancocas, Oreckton, Shackamaxon, Poquessing, all which are names of places, and have grandeur in them. Of words of sweetness, anna is mother; issiums, a brother; netap, friend; usque oret, very good; pone, bread; metse, eat; matta, no; hatta, to have; payo, to come; Sepassincks, Passyunk, the names of places; Tammany, Secane, Menangy, Secetareus, are the names of persons. If one asks them for anything they have not, they will answer, matta ne hatta, which to translate is “not I have,” instead of, “I have not.”

Deed recording the purchase of land at the mouth of the Susquehanna River from Machaloha, a Delaware (New Castle, October 18, 1683). This deed may have been intended as possible evidence in a controversy between Penn and Lord Baltimore over the ownership of this land.

William Penn, Proprietary and Governor of the province of Pennsylvania and the territories thereunto belonging.

I do hereby declare that I have bought of Machaloha all his land lying between Delaware River, the bay of Chesapeake, and Susquehanna River. And do warn all persons that they presume not to settle thereon without my leave, and that those that are already, or shall hereafter settle upon any part of the same do behave themselves justly and lovingly towards him and his fellow Indians.

Excerpts from William Penn’s “Conditions or Concessions to the First Purchasers” (July 11, 1681). A document setting the conditions for purchasing land.

13thly. That no man shall, by any ways or means in word or deed, affront or wrong any Indian, but he shall incur the same penalty of the law as if he had committed it against a fellow planter.

14thly. That all differences between the planters and the natives shall also be ended by twelve men, that is, by six planters and six natives...

15thly. That the Indians shall have liberty to do all things relating to the improvement of their ground and providing sustenance for their families, that any of the planters shall enjoy.

These excerpts are reprinted as published in William Penn and the Founding of Pennsylvania 1680-1684 A Documentary History, edited by Jean R. Soderlund, copyright 1983, with the kind permission of the copyright owner, University of Pennsylvania Press.

Just as a deed symbolized a land exchange to Europeans, the wampum belt signified cooperation to the Indians. Simple shell beads or wampum (literally “white string”) were used as a medium of exchange by Indians and Europeans. The wampum belt is said to have been presented by the Indians to Penn as a solemn record at the fabled friendship meeting of 1682 at Shack-amaxon (present-day Kensington) but there is no proof that the meeting ever happened. The belt may have been made after Penn’s death, but it signifies the Indians’ regard for Penn and his non-violence doctrine.
